The NCAA: Where Everything Old Is New Again
New Leadership Is Only Part Of The Changes At The NCAA

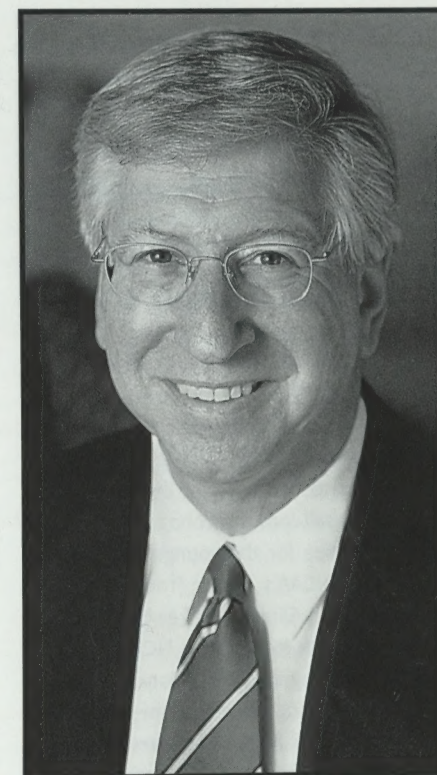

As the National Collegiate Athletic Association approaches its centennial in 2006, the theme for the Association these days is "Everything Old Is New Again." If you're curious about what's new with the 96-year-old NCAA, the answer is plenty, including new leadership, a new emphasis on education and new championship coverage.

At the top of the list of "new" is the president of the NCAA. Myles Brand, president of Indiana University, was chosen October 1 to become the fourth executive director and president of the Association in the last 25 years. The 60-year-old Brand was selected for the post of NCAA president from a group of three finalists. He will replace current president Cedric Dempsey, who announced his retirement in January and who will finish an eight-year term as the Association's chief executive director, January 1, 2003, when Brand takes over. Brand's contract runs through 2007.

During his tenure as NCAA president, Dempsey oversaw the relocation of the national office from Kansas City to Indianapolis, restructuring of the NCAA governance process to place authority for intercollegiate athletics in the hands of college presidents and negotiation of new contracts with CBS and ESPN that ensure the Association's financial stability for more than a decade.

For his part, the new president-elect didn't take long to set his theme for what his administration may become. At the press conference announcing his selection, Brand said: "The integrity of intercollegiate athletics is absolutely critical ... We must integrate intercollegiate athletics with [the] academic mission of universities and colleges. These are not separate missions with separate goals."

The integration of athletics and academics received a lift with the announcement in September of the latest graduation rates for student-athletes. For the first time since the federal government has been collecting graduation data and the NCAA began publishing the results a dozen years ago, student-athletes in Division I are achieving a 60 percent graduation rate. On average, student-athletes perform better in terms of graduation rates than the rest of the full-time student body.

Dr. Myles Brand

The rates were up in nearly every sport for both men and women and across ethnic lines. Male student-athletes in Division I are graduating at a rate of 54 percent (compared to 51 percent a year ago), and female student-athletes are graduating at a rate of 69 percent (the same as last year). Male student-athletes graduate slightly under their counterparts in the student body (54 percent compared to 56 percent), but female student-athletes graduate considerably better than women in the student body (69 percent compared to 61 percent).

New academic standards in Division I for both initial eligibility and continuing eligibility are expected to take effect next fall that will drive the graduation rates even higher. Although graduation rates in Divisions II and III also increased, the data collected by the federal government measure the rates only for student-athletes on scholarship, a distinction that misses the success of many student-athletes in those two divisions who compete without athletically related financial support.

There is increased support for Divisions II and III as well as Division I this year with the new CBS and ESPN contracts. These "bundled rights" agreements go beyond the traditional television rights agreements. Beginning with the new contracts with CBS and ESPN this fall, all 87 NCAA championships in 22 sports for men and women will receive coverage either through telecasts, cablecasts or the Internet. This is the first time in history that coverage is extended to every event from the first round through the championship.

The new contracts — 11-year deals with CBS and ESPN — will generate about $6.2 billion which will mean new revenue for the NCAA and member institutions. Based on the increased revenue from the new contracts, the NCAA budget for 2002-03 is $422 million, an increase of 22 percent over last year. What most college sports fans don't realize is that 94 cents of every dollar in the budget goes back to the membership in the form of direct dollar payments, support of the 87 championships and other events, and other goods and services.

Earmarked specifically for student-athletes are three programs totaling more than $44 million for this year alone. Included in the budgeted amounts are the continuation of an annual $10 million special assistance fund that helps needy student-athletes buy winter coats, tickets for emergency trips home or other personal needs. Also continuing is a $17 million academic enhancement fund that supports the educational needs of student-athletes, and new this year is a $17 million student-athlete opportunity fund. Over the course of the 11-year contract with CBS and ESPN, the NCAA will earmark more than three-quarters of a billion dollars for student-athletes.

There's plenty of new things going on at the NCAA. Not bad for an organization about to celebrate its 100th birthday.

There Is More To The NCAA Than You Might Think

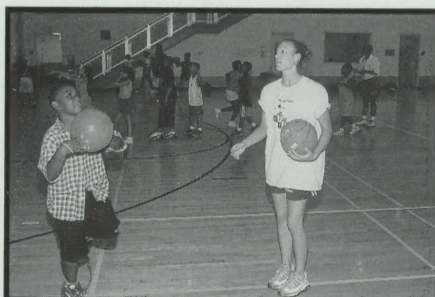

Of course the NCAA is known for its championships. Unless you've been surviving on a deserted island and have yet to be voted off, you've at least heard of the NCAA Sweet 16™, The Big Dance™ or The Final Four®.

"Almost everyone you meet knows there is a Men's and a Women's Final Four. But I think that's where the familiarity stops," says Tom Jacobs, director of championships. "Much of the general public would be surprised to know the NCAA sponsors 85 other championships. And just a few could name all 22 sports in which we conduct championships."

Even if most people can't name all the sports, these NCAA-sponsored events bring more to the communities than zealous fans with banners and painted faces. They also bring the opportunity of a lifetime for children.

The NYSP initiative is a five-week program conducted on 190 college campuses.

A chance to work drills with a national coach, to talk to top college athletes about their dreams and to find out that the books come first and the ball comes second are just a few of the possibilities for the youngsters who take part in the NCAA's YES® (Youth Education through Sports) Clinics. The free clinics, held in conjunction with many of the NCAA's national championships, join top collegiate coaches and athletes with young children in the community. Each year, the NCAA dedicates more than $2 million to youth education programs.

Instead of relying on championship tournament opportunities alone to reach children, the NCAA also goes directly to them. The NCAA, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services and the U.S. Department of Agriculture work together to support the National Youth Sports Program (NYSP). This is a five-week program conducted on more than 190 college and university campuses across the country. Built around the NYSP's basic foundation that all children deserve the experiences and friendships that a summer sport camp can bring, this program combines athletic know-how with important life skills.

"Youth programs supported by the NCAA target students from 10 to 18 years old," says Ron Stratten, NCAA vice-president for education services. "They are young people who have a chance to go left or go right. We would like to see them go right — in sports and into the positive aspects of life."

The price tag for the five-week program is budget-friendly for the participants. It's free. Through local donations, financial assistance from the NCAA and grants from the federal government, approximately 70,000 children each year learn about academics, athletics, nutrition and career planning without money and dad having to worry about the price tag.

To drive home the importance of academics, many colleges invite professional and collegiate athletes to speak to the groups and the kids are often surprised by what they hear.

It's an important message no matter what the age. It is by no mistake that the focus at the NCAA only refer to their athletes as student-athletes." The student is first. Athletics is secondary.

That's because if athletes are banking on having a professional sports career, the NCAA knows that the odds are against them:

- Only 1.3 percent of NCAA male basketball players make it to the pros;
- Only 2.0 percent of NCAA football players make it to the NFL;
- Only 1.0 percent of NCAA female basketball players make it to the pros;
- Only 5.6 percent of high school baseball players make it to an NCAA team.

With this uphill climb to the pros that only a few make, it is important that today's college student-athletes are prepared for the course work that awaits them when they get off the field or court. They also need to be prepared for life outside of sports after graduation.

"We try to make sure that the student-athletes get the things they need so they come out of the university a balanced person, not just a person who is bigger and stronger because of athletics," says Stratten. "Our mission continues to be to keep higher education and athletics close."

Enter the CHAMPS/Life Skills Program described by an NCAA staff member as a "Life 101" course. This new program helps the high school student make a seamless transition to college. Since its beginning in 1994, the program has grown by leaps and bounds. An average of 50 universities adopt the program every year.

Each NCAA school tailors the CHAMPS/Life Skills Program to meet the needs of its own student-athletes. While each university's CHAMPS/Life Skills Program may be different, each has the same goal — to help student-athletes achieve a positive collegiate experience.

NCAA Decision Makers

You May Be Surprised Who They Really Are

NCAA

"CAA fines university." "NCAA declares student-athlete ineligible."

With headlines like those hitting the papers, and in a society where bad news gets more attention than good news, it's easy to conclude that the NCAA acts as judge and jury when it comes to college athletics.

When people hear 'NCAA,' they think power. But this Association itself has no power whatsoever that isn't granted by the member institutions," says Danita Edwards, NCAA vice-president of public affairs.

Perhaps the most simplistic way to explain who the bosses are is to say that administrators at roughly 1,000 colleges and universities actually write NCAA rules. In 1994, university presidents and chancellors wrote the governing framework so that they, or their institutions, are the ones who adopt new rules and regulations. It also means that they have to be acutely aware of what is happening in their own athletics department as well as those of their peers.

Giving the power to the key decision makers on campus gives the colleges, universities and conferences the power to make decisions that will positively impact present and future student-athletes.

"It's not the NCAA staff that makes the rules," says Dan Boggan, NCAA senior vice-president. "The NCAA staff members enforce the rules the institutions make. We are an organization that supports NCAA colleges and universities by implementing the policies, legislation and rules that they write for themselves."

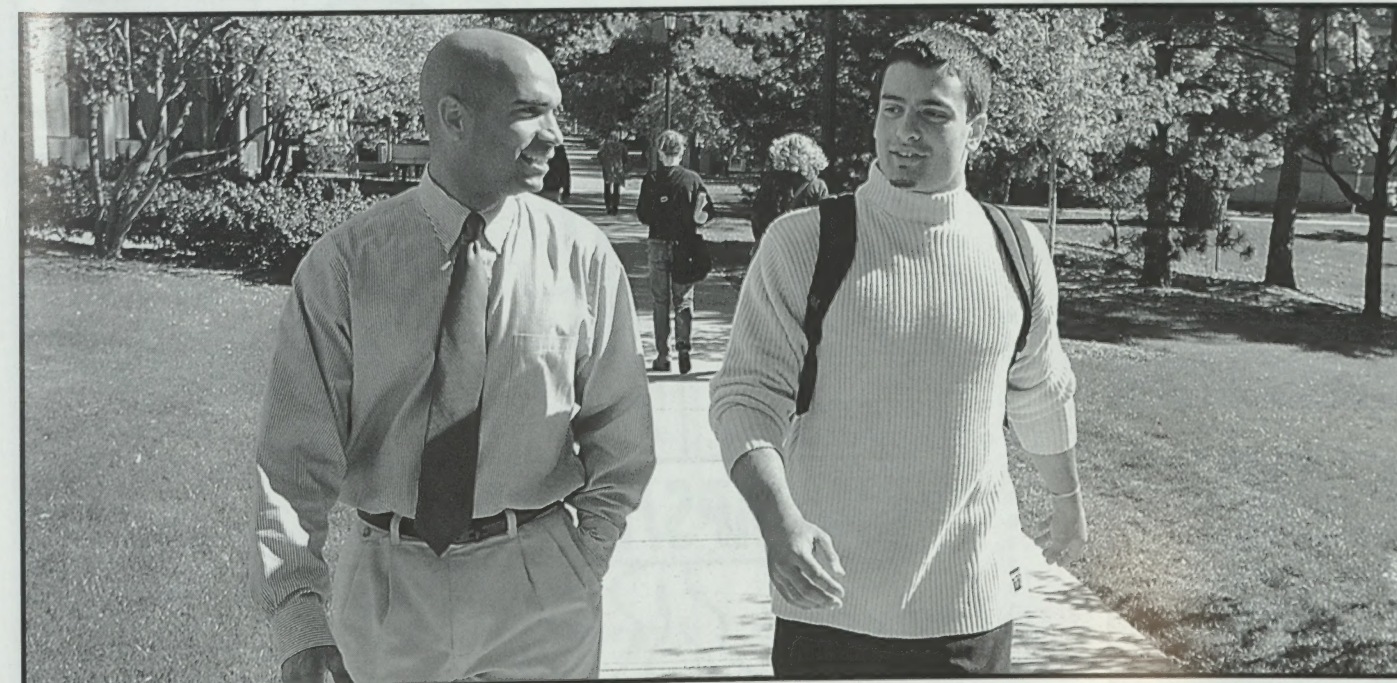

Essentially, there are three levels to the NCAA governing structure. University athletics directors and faculty athletics representatives make up the Management Council that evaluates the issues from a campus level. If this group determines that there is a need for change, it proposes the idea to the university presidents and chancellors who make up the Board of Directors (or Presidents Council as it is referred to in Divisions II and III). Based on merit, the idea may ultimately make its way to the top tier of decision makers, the Executive Committee, which is made up of members of the Board of Directors and Presidents Council from all three divisions.

"My typical response to people who are questioning a decision that is made about their school is that they need to talk to their university and find out what role they played in putting the rule in place. Because often times, their own school may have voted in favor of the rule in question," says Boggan.

The universities and athletics departments are not guided by the NCAA, as may be the perception. Instead you could really say that the NCAA is guided by them.

The power to make key decisions that affect student-athletes resides on campuses across the nation.
